Rogerian essays are often used in college assignments, particularly in research papers, where students' credibility is increased when they are able to present opposing viewpoints "essay writer". Rogerian logic and argumentation techniques help writers structure their ideas logically within an argument and express them persuasively, whether or not those ideas are well received by readers. The Rogerian essay uses three components: an acknowledgment of the strengths or values found in alternative perspectives.

It is one of several argumentative or persuasive writing strategies in which writers articulate their point of view on an issue while also recognizing that many readers may not agree with them. Rogerian essays are often used in college assignments, particularly in research papers, where students' credibility is increased when they are able to present opposing viewpoints (Woods). Rogerian logic and argumentation techniques help writers structure their ideas logically within an argument and express them persuasively, whether or not those ideas are well received by readers.

Express your own ideas without attacking those presented by others. Roger called these methods the attitude of non-defensiveness. Roger believed that these three simple ideas, if practiced regularly and consistently, would lead to a solution for an argument in which both parties involved could be satisfied (Roger). Roger also claimed that his Rogerian argument was not meant to be used as a way of life or applied in every situation but rather was only intended to avoid arguments during discussions and debates. The Rogerian essay is one type of writing strategy that uses Roger's principles outlined above "write my essay". The Rogerian essay has three stages: First, state your topic and thesis statement clearly while acknowledging opposing beliefs; then give reasons for why you believe what you do; finally, provide examples or evidence to support your claims (Woods). Rogerian essays often follow this format. Rogerian Argumentation Theory was developed by American philosopher and educator Carl Roger, in his book "The Rogerian Argument", published 1955. Roger proposed that differences of opinion could be reconciled through the use of an argumentative process he called 'the method of nondefense'.
